| Spring 1859 | "The women were cross, especially at meal time, when they would have the flapjacks and bacon nearly ready and a strong wind would scatter them over the prairie. The men, of course, were always pleasant, and why should they not be on a trip like that, when their only ambition is to lay upon the grass and play cards while the women have the wood, a scarce article to gather, the cooking and often the cattle to take care of? I do not wonder that men laugh and grow fat when they meditate how helpless women are cowed down by their iron will.
